

After Campus

01

Conversations that continue after the last seminar.

Inside: a fictional graduate interview,
alumni notes and a reunion programme.

FICTIONAL DEMO / No real institution, graduate or reunion is represented.

Keeping a reading habit

An invented interview with Rowan Ellis, a fictional former student. Answers are authored demo text, not a testimonial.

What did you keep from student life?

A habit of writing a question in the margin. It helps me notice when I have followed the words but lost the point. I still use a small notebook rather than trying to save every sentence.

How does a reading circle work for you?

We choose a short piece and ask each person to bring one passage and one question. Someone keeps the discussion moving, but nobody has to deliver a prepared talk.

What makes it easy to return?

A clear date, a manageable reading and permission to arrive with an unfinished thought. The best invitation explains what a newcomer needs to bring.

What would you tell a new graduate?

Keep one conversation open. A small regular exchange can be more useful than waiting until you have a major achievement to announce.

Back around the table

The reading circle

In this fictional update, the next discussion considers a short essay about public space. Members bring one marked passage. The facilitator collects questions rather than a list of correct interpretations.

Notes from the archive

The sample archive team is preparing a page of old course titles and notebook covers. Real contributions would need a caption, a date and permission before publication.

REUNION PROGRAMME / INVENTED EXAMPLE

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| 10:00 | Arrive and find a table |
| 10:30 | A short conversation with the fictional interview editor |
| 11:15 | Reading-circle exchange in small groups |
| 12:00 | Close with one suggestion for the next letter |

Dates, people and activities are fictional. This is a publication sample, not an invitation to an actual event.
